The tiny, salt-and-pepper mutt — a stray named Coco who was seized and taken to a small animal hospital run by volunteers — was reportedly revived by a veterinarian who used electrical shock therapy to get his heart back into rhythm. There's a lot more to this story. After the heart attack, the dog was rushed to the intensive care unit, where veterinarians operated on him for 25 minutes, stitching up his chest and removing six milliliters of blood. He was sent to Bangkok Veterinary Diagnostic Center and Recovery for treatment, where, for nine days, his recovery has been closely monitored. While the team at the Bangkok Veterinary Diagnostic Center and Recovery has said very little, The Nation, the state-run English-language newspaper, reported that Coco has kidney problems and had a heart condition. "The dog survived because he was given a quick and effective operation," said a woman who identified herself only as Dr. Daprat, one of the doctors at the center. But the vets who are known for their quick actions have never commented on the details of Coco's treatment. Two vets at the center declined to talk about the case, and attempts to reach the woman who gave the press conference were unsuccessful. Coco's owner hasn't said anything publicly about the dog, either, so there's only so much you can glean about the dog from the reports — which include a statement that Coco has been "removed from the intensive care unit." And with owners' identities being blurred, it's going to be a while before we know who was actually responsible for the dog. The owner's identity is known only to the dog and the hospital.
